Dear Mr Huhne,

I write to you regarding the issue of khat in the UK - the leaves and shoots of the bush Catha edulis, chewed by many people as a "social drug". As you may know, I follow the khat issue closely from the Swedish point of view.

My home town Malmö at the Swedish side of the Öresund Bridge is the main entrance point for khat into Sweden. According to Swedish law, khat is an illegal narcotic. The social and human costs of khat abuse in Sweden are high and rising. Every year, increasing amounts of the drug are smuggled across our border, in spite of increased commitment by police and customs personnel. There are suspicions of a connection between the illegal khat trade and financing of networks such as the Al-Shabaab in Somalia. I view this matter most seriously for all these reasons.

Most of the khat that reaches Sweden can do so because there is still a legal entrance route to Europe via the Netherlands and the UK, the only two EU countries where khat is not banned. Khat is both very bulky and a highly perishable substance which must be consumed quickly after harvest. Keeping the legal flight route open is crucial for the traders of khat.

Last week, the Dutch government requested the Parliament in the Hague to add khat to the list of illegal narcotic substances, taking the first step towards a Dutch khat ban.

This initiative by the Dutch government also brings the issue of the UK stand to the forefront. Will the UK be the only EU country allowing an inflow of this amphetamine-like drug? Is there any debate on the legality of khat in the UK today? Do you see any possibility of a British ban in the near future?

I know that the issue is not directly on your table, but your advice on what may be done and on how I may best approach your party colleagues in the British government about this matter would be most appreciated. I would be highly grateful for any doors you could open for my continued contacts!

I look much forward to hearing from you.
With kind regards,

Olle Schmidt
